What is school social work and who is it aimed at?

How can school social workers be contacted?

School social workers provide counseling services to children and adolescents, parents and teachers.

School social workers are present at school during school hours and can be reached either by e-mail, telephone or personal contact.

Children receive prompt and straightforward help and support if needed. School social workers help to solve problems. Fears, worries, disputes or just questions about the best way of working and playing together can be discussed in a safe place and solutions can be worked out. Children are guided either alone or in groups.

Counseling services are usually voluntary and often initiated by a teacher.

Parents can contact School social workers, who are concerned about a child's development or worry about a specific situation in school.

When should parents contact a school social worker?

Teachers can also discuss difficult situations regarding individuals or groups with the school social worker. Most problems tend to be dealt with as a group as this has better results usually.

- If they worry about their child's development.
- If they are concerned about a school issue.
- It is always wise to approach a school social worker sooner

School social workers stimulate relevant school projects and/ or school activities for the whole school as well as for individual classes upon request.

Even if you feel an issue has no way of being resolved, the school social worker usually can help.
